ginia is a courteous, venerable kindhearted old man by the name of Oceola Pinkerton. One wild wintry day, when the ground was covered with snow of the imposing church, whose sextontinotion; as he stood looking up the main street of the village, there came walking down this street a "po white man" from the mountains, whose most conspicuous mark was an immense pair of boots with high yellow tops, reaching haif-way from the kinee to the thigh, of which the man was evidently very proud and into which he had stuffed his trousers with the design of showing off his ample and gaudy yellow tops. The white man was plaisly under the influence of the numerous drinks taken on this raw day. His gait was unsteady and the boots moved somewhat uncertainly as their wearer approached the slick, ice-coated pavement in front of the Sexton's church; as he came directly in front of the kind-hearted courteous old negro, with a low bow and a warning volce, out dar or you'll fall down and hut you set," With an oath and threatening gesture, he was warned to tend to his cown business. "All right, boss, all right," says he. Just then there was a crash, the heart flew up the head flew down. own business. "All right, boss, all right," says he. Just then there was a crash, the boots flew up, the head flew downg there was a confused scene in which boots and head and arms and curses were mised together, and over all the smilling face of the courteous Occola, grinning until every white tooth was grinning until every white tooth was amply revealed, and saying: "Seems like dem boots is slippors."

'Lawd Gwine Disappint 'em.I" "Lawd Gwine Disappint 'em.!"

Bob Inglin was man-of-all-work for the young pastor in C—in South Cardelina, He had belonged to aristocratic people and had all the dignity and airs of his former master Chancella J—in He was a valuable servant except that he would get upon protracted and exchanging sprees every three to six months. The young pastor remonstrated in vain with his valued servant. At last he determined after a more protracted spree than usual on the part of the old negro to talk as severely and impressively to his servant as he could so calling Bob, the pastor, looking solomnly in his eye said; "Do you know what is going to happen to you in one of these drunken spreent?" No Massa, I dun no. Wat you tink swine happen?" dun no. Wat you tink swine happen?"
Well" said the pastor "You are going 'Well' said the pastor "You are going, to die in one of these spress and wake up dead, and dammed and in bell."

For thirty full seconds Bob looked squarely in his employers face and then a gleam of humor shot athwart his big distended eye as he broke the stlence "Yes Massa, dat wat a good many tink, but the Lawd gwine disappint 'em.
